Course syllabus

Aims:
- To familiarise students with some key objects in the British Museum and, through this, to introduce them to the Iron Age
- To enable students to identify some of the key questions that archaeologists ask of Iron Age material culture

Content:

This day school begins with the tutor’s favourite Iron Age person, Lindow Man, who provides an ideal starting point to our day because he enables students to literally come face to face with the Iron Age. He opens up so many questions about Iron Age life, attitudes towards and treatment of the dead, and ritual practices, not to mention the ethics of displaying dead bodies. Through discussion of bog bodies, we will make a little foray across to other museums in Europe which house such people.

From here we will move to the golden treasures of the glorious Snettisham torques, using them as a springboard to discussing hoards in general, the recently discovered Jersey coin hoard, conspicuous consumption, and the Treasure Trove act.

In our third lecture we will visit the dead a second time – the so-called ‘Deal Warrior’ – or to be more precise, his head-dress, and why he isn’t all he seems to be. What is the significance of the ‘Celtic’ art on his sword and head-dress, and how might we begin to understand this form of art?

Finally, in anticipation of the coming of the Romans, we focus on the Aylesford Bucket, its design of dancing horses, and its role as a vessel for cremated bones. To what extent did it mirror graves goods on the other side of the channel, and what does this connote?

A body, a bucket, a head-dress and a torque: rich treasures indeed!

Presentation of the course:

The course will be taught through interactive seminar-style lectures; class discussion and questions will be encouraged.

As a result of the course, within the constraints of the time available, students should be able to:
- Have a basic understanding of the British Iron Age
- Have a familiarity with some key treasures in the British Museum’s Iron Age gallery
- Identify the various elements of objects that are used by archaeologists to make their interpretations
- Make preliminary interpretations of similar objects in other museums
